Public health is faced with several challenges today, including emerging and re-emerging infectious diseases, noncommunicable diseases, and the growing burden of environmental pollution and climate change, all of which present a significant threat to human health. One of the possible interventions to address these threats is the sustainable development goals of the United Nations. However, in achieving this goal, it will be essential to develop a roadmap for the long-term sustainability of medical education systems. Medical schools currently face many challenges, among them ensuring sustainability. This article outlines the challenges faced by medical schools today, and describes how a sustainable medical education system can be developed and implemented. The articles of this special issue of the Journal of Medical Education address these issues and describe how to achieve sustainable medical education. Wednesday, May 4, 2016 DailyKos (blog) has run
